Looking at you I see her face
Through all these years, just waiting
It all catches up to you when you slow down

I'm back in that yard, tasting that shame Of pushing her down, Of kids and her games ...their strongholds

We had a bigger world - we had a better view I guess I never fully realized then What she lost when I cut that loss

So she filled the void with unearthly friends Voices of hers - greater... than us

We had a bigger world - we had a better view I wish she'd never told us about her voices We were strong, we were much too strong

Never forgive - never forget

We picked and pierced, we ripped and we tore We hit and we scratched to make in her a hole Glares and eyes - whispers and notes Attached to her every pose

We fed her shouts

For the collection of her voices

I was too weak to collect

But so, it turned out, was she

Both paid in soul for the cutting of that loss

Their ugly truth
Outnumbered by far her beautiful dream
And I closed my eyes
Were her eyes in yours already when we met?
Am I still paying debts to recover Life?

Now I can see she proved to be right
As she was called down
It's sad though...
...that I turned out to be one of her voices.
