Once upon a time there was a mountain that rose out of a vast g reen forest. And in the forest there were birds and lakes and r ocks and trees and rivers. The forest was also inhabited by a s mall group of people called the lizards. The lizards were a sim ple people and they had lived in the forest undisturbed for tho usands of years in utter peace and tranquillity. Once a year wh en spring came, and the first blossoms began to show, the lizards would gather at the base of the mountain, to give thank s for all that they had. They thanked the birds and they thanke d the lakes and they thanked the rocks and the trees and the ri vers; but most importantly, they thanked Icculus.

Icculus lived at the top of the mountain, or at least everyone thought so, for no one had actually ever seen him. But they kne w he existed, because they had the Helping Friendly Book. Iccul us had given the Helping Friendly Book to the Lizards thousands of years earlier as a gift. It contained all of the knowledge inherent in the universe, and had Enabled the Lizards to exist in harmony with nature for years. And so they lived; until one day a traveler arrived in Gamehend ge. His name was Wilson and he quickly became intrigued by the Lizards way of life. He asked if he could stay on and live in t he forest; and the Lizards, who had never seen an outsider, wer e happy to oblige.

Wilson lived with the Lizards for a few years, studying the way s of the Helping Friendly Book, and all was well. Until one mor ning when they awoke and the book was gone. Wilson explained th at he had hidden the book, knowing that the Lizards had become dependent on it for survival. He declared himself king and ensl aved the innocent

People of Gamehendge. He cut down the trees and built a city, w hich he called Prussia. And in the center of the city he built a castle, and locked in the highest tower of the castle lay the Helping Friendly Book out of the reach of the Lizards forever. But our story begins at a different time, not in Gamehendge, b ut on a suburban street in Long Island, and our hero is no king sitting in a castle, he is a retired colonel shaving in his ba throom.

Colonel Forbin looked square in the mirror and dragged the blad e across his cold creamed skin. He saw the tired little folds o f flesh that lay in a heap beneath his eyes. Fifty-two years of obedient self-restraint, of hiding his tension behind a serene veil of composure. For fifty-two years he had piled it all on the back burner, and for fifty-two years it had boiled, frothin g over in a turbulent storm inside of him. It had escaped throu gh his eyes, reacting with the cigarette smoke and the fluoresc ent lights and slowly accumulating into a sagging mass. He ran his dripping palm across the stubble on the nape of his neck an d thought again about the door. He had discovered the door some months back on one of his ritualistic morning walks with his d og McGrupp. It had started out as a typical stroll with McGrupp bounding joyously ahead of the preoccupied colonel. As they re ached the apex of the hill, he saw it and he knew it had always been there, and felt foolish for overlooking the door for so l ong. At first, he tried to ignore it, but he soon found that it was impossible, and slowly his newly acquired knowledge transf ormed his dreary life into a prison from which there was only o ne escape. And on this morning, Colonel Forbin stepped through the door...
