Leningrad

Chris de Burgh

There she stood in an empty room, heard a voice from another ti me, And the memories came rolling back of Leningrad in the war; For the girl in the photograph, much had changed in the years t hat passed, But her longing for the boy she loved was still the same since the war; It was a moonless night upon the road of life, when he'd held h er to say goodbye, Many more would survive, for he stayed behind to help them live again; When they met at the garden gate, tears would fall from a deep embrace, For she never knew what happened to the boy she loved in the wa r; Back in those happy days, before the soldiers came, To break down the ones who remained, And they only survived, who could learn to die, and live to fig ht again; There they stood in an empty room, heard a voice from another t ime, And their memories came rolling back of Leningrad in the war.