The Shrine Of Mad Laughter

Deathspell Omega

God of terror, very low dost thou bring us, very low hast thou brought us...

A sensation of everlasting rot and those frantic wails, No, it is not a fall into the abyss The defiance of descent, A coronation beyond liberty and slavery; The cry of woe and deliverance exudes a flame, Evasive as sound and ether: An instant of collusion with death, Without hope nor prospect, yet it is a World below and above and in all eternity, A gift of fever, the wind of death That sustains the life in me, yes, The lightness of hovering in permanent Anguish; I dared to borrow those words, To articulate them and to savour their turpitude, As I beheld the shrine of mad laughter.

The limit is crossed with a weary horror: Hope seemed a respect which fatigue grants to the necessity of the world.

As if Death was dashed onto the death within, A violent thrust stealing the light of the eyes, A ray of darkness, a negation, The bread of bitterness that ignites neither devotion nor fervour; Resplendent nothingness! Make all things appear with clarity, Ruined in the flame of repudiation, In the flame of God! Interwoven joy and confusion, A stabbing confusion, asphyxiation from within, Yet I gained this certitude: Malediction, degradation, sown in me like seeds Now belonged to death, in harbouring a desire for the hideous, I was beckoning to death. Insatiable combustion, expand, this body is the vessel of grace!

The idea of God is pale next to that of perdition, but of this I could have no inkling in advance.