Disengagement

Insomnium

What solemnity can be found in this death? A traitor's smile, the honour of betrayal

How comfort could be found
In the dreariest of nights?
What solace for guilt-driven mind
Tarnished heart?
Two crestfallen figures clinging
Together in fathomless dark
In maelstrom of despair
Dimming each other's shine

And half of his blood runs like mine Kindred spirit to me But the gleam in his eyes remind Of the one who is gone forever

When dreams carry me past this life To thin shrouding mist I rest in silence In place lifeless and desolate

Long are midwinter's nights
As the will to live has died
Evanescent the unwarming light
Evoking memories of life
- Of the life long lost
Buried in ashes of love and joy

And half of his blood bleeds like mind Kindred spirit, yet free But the gleam in his eyes abates For my guilt shackles him too

What sublimity can be found in this love? Weakling's trust, the moral of deceiver

There's no future for a son
Under this burden of grief
No leading to walk aside this tormented ghost
Two crestfallen figures clinging
Together in fathomless dark
In maelstrom of despair father
Suppressing the only shine

As the end is slowly looming Our paths must now diverge Pressure slowly easing Shackles unchained, uplifting

Beyond many a weary league Where dimming light gives birth to evening stars At the treelines of distant, devouring woods Await my demons, embodying this longing

Better to sleep now on stranger's porch Find home on foreign soil Brighter the sun to a forsaken child Than to a father in despair Disencumbered from this grief With the most cruel way Deserted to be alone, abandoned to be free