Something About Trains

Jane Siberry

Something about trains Something about love Something about this old Earth And the way it looks from up above Something about satellites Something about down below Something about the hissing of that old steam iron As you press your clothes Beam it up, beam it down Across the world from town to town Most of the time when I'm walking the line I'm looking at the ground Every time I hear that whistle blowing And every time I hear that old black crow Every time I hear that whistle blowing I find myself a-shivering in my soul Something about love When things go wrong When you can't find the one that you love You keep movin' on You walk the lonely, lonely valley You walk the line alone But this old earth is always there You don't feel so alone Beam it up, beam it down Across the world from town to town Most of the time when I'm walking the line I'm looking at the ground But every time I hear that whistle blowing But you wake up in the middle of the night And a train whistle blows and a dog barks And something's not quite right And the cry is sent up from this earth Into the silent sky Beam it up, beam it down Across the world from town to town Most of the time when I'm walking the line I'm looking at the ground But every time I hear that whistle blowing And every time I hear that old black crow Every time I hear that whistle blowing I find myself a-shivering in my soul Something about trains and love And the way this old earth looks tonight
