Letting You In

Boarded up, sealed off, with a chair against the door A deadbolt lock for each one that came before And I set, that chain, forever in it's place Swore to myself I'd never make the same mistakes. And then you, you came to me And in your hands a skeleton key

Letting you in Is the hardest thing I ever did The raging war between my heart and head The righter one don't always win Letting you in I still thank God for that day When you walked up and knew just what to say To make me come unhinged Letting you in

I still, don't know, what you saw in me I was beat up, broken down, closed off from everything But still, you knocked, and waited patiently

Until I found the strength to find an opening

Letting you in Is the hardest thing I ever did The raging war between my heart and head The righter one don't always win Letting you in I still thank God for that day When you walked up and knew just what to say To make me come unhinged Letting you in

And you, you came to me And in your hands a skeleton key

Letting you in Is the hardest thing I ever did The raging war between my heart and head The righter one don't always win Letting you in I still thank God for that day When you walked up and knew just what to say To make me come unhinged Letting you in Letting you in Kris Allen
