If I could save you, I surely would; I'd take the world with you, the way we should. I'd drown your violence in a sea of blood; I'd drown the pain for you in the breaking waves, I'd crown your innocence with the golden sun, I'd drown your violence in a sea of blood . . . South-west bound on the winding Aroads - days of scorched brown rolling hills and ripened fields, down to where the sun glistens on the sea b eneath Pentire. Diamond light, evenings becoming cool and fresh as the seasons change. I can't wait to see you again - feels like something good is going to h appen, as if reborn in the last days of summer, burned to the core and then somehow , made young once more - as if you were going to be the one crowned Harvest Oueen.

All the black will fade away in glory days, and Indian summer;

All love and change is one, all love and change forever... And I can feel it falling away, and I can feel it falling away from you...